Company snapshot

Legal name: Wedding Industry Ads, LLC, trading as LeadLock for its software line. The company renders its own name three ways across its properties — "Wedding Industry Ads, LLC", "Wedding Industry Ads LLC dba LeadLock", and "Wedding Industry Ads, LLC dba LeadLock". LeadLock is a trading name of the same entity, not a separate company.

Primary website: weddingindustryads.com

Product properties: leadlockpro.com (product marketing) and app.leadlockpro.com (product login).

Registered address: 213 Wonderstruck, Liberty Hill, TX 78642 — Williamson County, in the Austin metro. A residential-style address matching co-founder Whitney Hodges' home base; the firm keeps no commercial office.

Governing law: State of Texas, venue in Williamson County.

Founded: 2022. In Whitney Hodges' words: "In 2022, my business partner and I launched Wedding Industry Ads, a boutique agency for wedding venues + vendors." The domain was registered on 8 December 2022. The founders met in 2020 — the partnership predates the company by two years.

Ownership: Two co-founders, both women — Whitney Hodges and Daniela Justus. No outside investment, parent company, or acquisition history.

Category: Single-vertical boutique paid-media agency — Google Ads and Meta Ads — with a productised lead-management system attached. The vertical is exclusively the wedding industry.

Team: All-women by declared identity: "our team of incredible women", "employing a team of incredible women". Beyond the two founders, no staff member is named publicly and no headcount or revenue figure is published — a deliberately small boutique.

Reach: Fully remote from Texas: "we're based in Texas but work with clients all over the world."

Contact: hello@weddingindustryads.com (agency); support@leadlockpro.com (product). Instagram is the channel they actively monitor: "We mostly hang out on IG."

Social scale: Instagram @weddingindustryads runs at roughly 1,200 followers across 325 posts, alongside a Facebook page and a LinkedIn company page.

Domain records: weddingindustryads.com registered 8 December 2022, expiring 8 December 2026 — four months out. leadlockpro.com registered 2 March 2023, expiring 2 March 2027.

Core positioning

Wedding Industry Ads is a specialist by construction: one industry, two advertising platforms, and an explicit argument that general marketing playbooks do not transfer to weddings. The sharpest line in their copy reframes the category away from media buying altogether — "At WIA, we don't just run ads. We build client acquisition systems."

The argument underneath is structural. A wedding client is bought once and never repeats, so lead flow matters more than lifetime value — and that is why retention-oriented marketing advice misfires in this vertical. This idea is the intellectual core of the brand and recurs in every channel they touch.

Anti-organic. "Traditional online marketing strategies don't work for the wedding industry. You don't need a lead magnet. You don't need to build an email list. You don't need more followers." Unusually blunt for an agency — and mirrored in their own marketing choices: they run no blog and no newsletter.

Anti-directory. The premise for buying ads at all: "Organic marketing and referrals will only take you so far. Directory listings make it hard to stand out." Paid media is positioned against the directory platforms that dominate wedding vendor discovery.

Evergreen advertising. Campaigns as always-on infrastructure rather than seasonal pushes — working "24/7", improving as they accumulate data, and framed to clients as "an ongoing, long-term expense."

Conversions over clicks. One of three named differentiators, alongside industry-specific strategy and a collaborative, non-templated process. The emphasis is tracked inquiries, never traffic or engagement metrics.

Google and Meta as a pair. "The ultimate power couple" — intent capture on search, retargeting and interest targeting on social, and a firm position that each is materially weaker alone.

Ads alone are insufficient. The bridge into the product: "Advertising is just one piece of the puzzle. A high-converting inquiry funnel is the ticket to maximizing your ROI." This is the commercial logic for LeadLock.

Explicit anti-positioning. They name what they are not: DIY courses, "an ad manager who doesn't understand the industry", "an impersonal high-volume agency". Two tactics are named as actively not recommended — boosting Meta posts and Google Smart campaigns.

The numbers they argue with. Three unsourced marketing statistics anchor the website: 85% of wedding searches begin online; 70% of Gen Z relies on social media and online research over referrals; Meta retargeting is "40% more effective" at reaching engaged couples. LeadLock adds three from a Lead Connect study: 78% of customers book with whoever responds first, qualification drops up to 80% past five minutes, and same-minute contact lifts conversions up to 391%. All six are the company's own marketing numbers.

Leadership & brand identity

Two named principals and no other public faces. Both are marketers by trade rather than wedding operators, and both entered the vertical through Facebook advertising.

Whitney Hodges, Co-founder: Liberty Hill, Texas — the registered business address is her home base. A former luxury-events professional: "more than a decade of experience in marketing, selling, and producing luxury events." Running Meta ad campaigns since 2020, first for coaches, consultants, and course creators. A Texas wife and mother, and the author of the firm's Investment Guide.

Whitney's parallel practice: whitneyhodges.com remains live and current — "I'm a Meta Ads & Funnel Strategist and the Co-Founder & Co-Owner of Wedding Industry Ads" — serving coaches, consultants, course creators, and personality-based businesses as its own client base.

Daniela Justus, Co-founder: Lubbock, Texas. An artist turned advertiser and self-described serial entrepreneur; Facebook/Instagram ads and funnel strategist, and online business consultant.

Daniela's parallel agency: DEJA — Daniela E. Justus Agency, LLC, registered at 818 Avenue G, Lubbock, TX 79401 — scales "digital empires for course creators and membership brands." DEJA predates Wedding Industry Ads and is where the two founders first worked together: WIA is the newer venture, not a spin-out.

Origin story. The two met in 2020 as both were entering Facebook ads management, became — in their own recurring phrase — "biz besties", worked together inside DEJA serving online coaches and course creators, and launched Wedding Industry Ads in 2022 as the vertical-specific venture. Their joint bio claims a combined "over 12 years in sales, marketing, event planning, and management", with client work spanning budget-conscious events through weddings exceeding $1 million.

Brand voice. Warm, first-person-plural, and built on wedding vocabulary as wordplay — "power couple", "a match made in heaven", "the perfect union", clients who "vow to be an active participant". The all-women team is a stated point of pride, and the mission is framed in redistributive terms: "putting more money into the hands of wedding business owners."

Visual identity. A circular monogram in brand navy (#02084B) inside an accent-blue ring (#5271FF), set in a high-contrast serif; web typography runs Playfair Display, Poppins, and Roboto over #333333 body copy. This dossier is set in that palette.

Who they serve (target market)

The published target list — fourteen categories. Venues, Wedding Planners, Destination Specialists, Officiants, Rental Companies, Bridal Attire, Photographers, Videographers, Caterers, Stationers, Bands, DJs, Florists, and Wedding Industry Educators/Marketers — "& More!"

The centre of gravity is narrower than the list. Wedding venues carry the flagship case study and most of the testimonial weight; planners, photographers, and entertainers make up the remainder.

Fit criteria as a screening rubric. The site defines what "our most successful clients have in common": they appreciate the work and trust the process; they do not expect immediate results and understand results compound; they participate actively and give feedback; they have already done foundational work on ideal client and unique selling proposition; they are responsive, coachable, and ready to act; and they are comfortable embracing new technology.

The stated disqualifier. They want clients seeking "sustainable growth. Not a quick fix, last ditch effort to save your business." The Investment Guide sets three pre-conditions before a dollar goes to ads: a clear and compelling offer, a sales funnel that converts inquiries into bookings, and prior investment in brand and ideal-client definition.

Adjacent work accepted. For existing clients whose services extend into other event markets, they will run non-wedding campaigns — wedding work is "our clients' bread & butter", not a hard restriction.

The client roster signal. Testimonials run first-name-and-role only — Crystal (venue marketing director), Kate (venue owner), Adriana (event planner and founder), Elsa (luxury stationery), Kathleen (florist and business coach), Alyssa — with one telling exception: "Courtney | Aisle Planner". Aisle Planner is an established wedding-software company, which makes that testimonial a peer endorsement from inside the industry's own tooling ecosystem.

Offer stack (services & products)

Three things are sold: a done-for-you retainer, one-time guided implementations available per platform or bundled, and a subscription software product. Pricing, current as of the Q2 2026 Investment Guide:

OFFER	MODEL	PRICE	NOTES
Elevate	Ongoing monthly retainer; fully done-for-you	~$2,500 / month	A blended figure — "our services plus ad spend". The service fee alone is never broken out. Waitlist entry; "spots are very limited".
Google Search Accelerator	One-time, guided implementation	$1,997	Strategy and keyword research, done-for-you search campaign, conversion tracking setup. Excludes ad spend.
Meta Ads Accelerator	One-time, guided implementation	$1,697	Ad design resources and feedback, done-for-you campaign builds, Meta pixel setup. Excludes ad spend.

Accelerator Bundle	One-time, both platforms	$3,197	Everything from both Accelerators plus six months of guided support — a built-in saving of $497 against buying separately.
LeadLock	Setup fee plus subscription	$1,697+ setup; $147 / month	"Setup fees start at $1,697 and vary based on the scope of your project"; the $147 monthly subscription maintains platform access, plus messaging fees. Month-to-month or annual.

Accelerator prices exclude the client's own advertising spend.

Offer history — and what the price movement says. Both Accelerators are repackaged "VIP Day" products: single-day campaign builds sold through 2024 and 2025, since relaunched as multi-month guided programmes.

RETIRED OFFER (2024–25)	THEN	CURRENT EQUIVALENT (2026)	NOW	CHANGE
Google Ads VIP Day — 1 spot per month	$1,497	Google Search Accelerator	$1,997	+33%
Meta Ads VIP Day — 2 spots per month	$1,697	Meta Ads Accelerator	$1,697	unchanged

Google search work was repriced upward by a third while Meta held flat — search is treated as the scarcer, more defensible skill; Meta as the more commoditised one.

Prescribed client ad spend, separate from fees. Google alone: a $500-per-month minimum on a search campaign. Meta alone: $300 to $800 per month. Both platforms: "at least $1000 per month to split between Google & Meta Ads for optimal results." In interviews the founders set the bar higher — up to $1,000 per platform per month for consistent lead flow.

Total cost of entry, from their own figures. The Accelerator bundle at $3,197 plus $1,000 per month in media runs roughly $15,200 in year one. The retainer path at $2,500 per month blended runs roughly $30,000. Because the retainer figure includes media, the agency's own fee inside it is never visible — margin cannot be read from the outside.

LeadLock's product scope. A lead-management system for the pre-client stage — deliberately not a CRM replacement: inquiry forms, instant text and email follow-up, nurture sequences, scheduling and reminders, landing pages, chat widgets, reputation management, a pipeline dashboard, a consolidated communications inbox, and traffic-source attribution. It integrates Google and Outlook calendars and exports to external CRMs.

Delivery model, fulfillment policies, and operations

Onboarding runs as a seven-step, application-gated sequence. An application is submitted and the prospect's content and website are reviewed for fit. Approval lands "typically within 48 business hours", followed by contract and invoice. A questionnaire follows signed contract and payment. Scheduling books "2 weeks out" at the earliest, giving the team time to prepare. Delivery runs across two calls in a single day — strategy review in the morning, build review in the afternoon. Campaigns are monitored for the first 72 hours, and a check-in call follows two weeks later.

Two design choices stand out. Fit is assessed before price is discussed — the funnel is application-gated, not open-enrolment. And capacity is rationed openly: one Google slot per month, two Meta slots per month, and a retainer where "spots are very limited" behind a waitlist. Scarcity is part of the offer architecture.

Delivery posture. Fully remote and virtual — no office, no in-person delivery, no client-site work, serving clients internationally from Texas.

The agency's terms are thin. No refund policy, no cancellation policy, no payment terms, no contract length, no notice period. The document is generic template language and names no governing jurisdiction. For a firm selling engagements in the thousands of dollars, this is a material documentation gap.

The product's terms are the opposite — detailed and strict. "All sales are final, and no refunds will be provided." Subscriptions auto-renew after any trial, and payment details are collected before a trial begins. Cancellation takes effect only at the end of the current billing cycle. Customers are told to export their contact data before cancelling, because content availability afterwards is not guaranteed. Chargebacks may be reported to credit agencies. Prices may change with advance notice, effective the next billing period.

No service-level commitment exists on either side. LeadLock is "offered As Is"; the company "does not guarantee that the Platform... will be error-free or otherwise reliable." No uptime figure, no support-response target.

Disclaimers are extensive. Results disclaimers repeat across every page, alongside explicit non-affiliation statements for Google and Meta. Intellectual-property terms prohibit republication, resale, sublicensing, reproduction, and redistribution.

Thought leadership & content engine

The defining feature is an absence: there is no blog, no newsletter, no podcast, and no owned content library. The site map is a handful of funnel pages. Authority is built entirely on other people's audiences — a strategy fully consistent with their own doctrine that wedding pros don't need content marketing.

One conversion path. The homepage runs seventeen buttons; fourteen of them open the same lead-capture modal — "Grab Our Ads Investment Guide — Your Shortcut To Profitable Google Ads & Meta Ads For Your Wedding Business", collecting first name, last name, email, phone, and a qualifying "Tell us a little bit about you!" dropdown behind a "SEND ME THE INFO" submit. Three buttons scroll within the page. The only links out are LeadLock's site and one broken mobile consultation link. Every road on the homepage leads to a single popup.

Fourteen borrowed-audience placements. The "As Featured In" strip: The Unfiltered Entrepreneur, Wedding Pro CEO Summit, The High-End Wedding Summit, Irresistible Selling Summer School Series, Academy Pro, Wedding Summit Series, The Venue Rx Podcast, Planning Pod, Evolve Your Wedding Business, Book More Weddings Virtual Summit, I Do Wedding Marketing Podcast, The Wedding Pro CEO Podcast, Wedding Summit Series Luxury Edition, and ILEA's San Antonio chapter.

The podcast circuit. Evolve Your Wedding Business (episode 302) is the most substantive appearance, carrying their return-on-ad-spend claims and budget guidance; Wedding Pro CEO (episode 236) covers consistent lead generation; The Venue Rx features them on ad copy; further appearances run through Engage Your Brand (episode 37), The Venue Success Podcast, and "Paid Ads 101 for Wedding Pros".

Four lead magnets. The Ads Investment Guide — a 12-page, Canva-produced PDF, refreshed quarterly ("Q2 2026"), carrying the full price list. A venue case study — an all-inclusive wedding venue in the Tennessee mountains, combining Google, Meta, and LeadLock. "The Proven Inquiry Funnel" — the exact automated texts and emails they deploy. And LeadLock's "Speed to Lead" guide.

Summit teaching. For the Book More Weddings Summit they contributed a beginner's guide and step-by-step workbook for building a Google search campaign.

Partnerships & tools (public alignments)

HighLevel — disclosed, not hidden. "Yes, we built LeadLock on HighLevel - and we're proud of it." The claimed differentiation is the wedding-specific layer: customised workflows, designed funnels, messaging templates, and hands-on support. White-label platform resale is usually left implicit; here it is a talking point.

Google and Meta. The operating platforms, carried with explicit non-affiliation disclaimers. Neither a Google Partner nor a Meta Business Partner badge appears anywhere — notable for a paid-media specialist, since both are attainable and competitors display them.

Aisle Planner. A client, evidenced by a named testimonial — the strongest single credibility signal in their public record, and conspicuously underused: it appears once, as a first-name quote.

Planning Pod and ILEA San Antonio. Planning Pod appears in the featured-in strip; ILEA's San Antonio chapter is the sole industry-association marker.

Lead Connect. The cited research source behind LeadLock's speed-to-lead statistics.

Tech/stack signals (from public site cues)

> Website platform: GoHighLevel, entirely. Every asset on both domains resolves to GHL infrastructure — leadconnectorhq.com, assets.cdn.filesafe.space, and the msgsndr storage bucket. The agency runs its own business on the same platform it resells to clients as LeadLock.

Account structure: One GoHighLevel sub-account (location ID Xi40zxmRvW8Pbyk5DYHp) operates both weddingindustryads.com and leadlockpro.com.

Content management: None. No CMS, no blog engine, an empty sitemap.xml, a blank robots.txt. The public web presence is a small set of funnel pages, not a site tree.

Analytics: Google Tag Manager. No heatmapping, session recording, or A/B tooling is present.

Typography: Playfair Display, Poppins, and Roboto via Google Fonts.

DNS and hosting: weddingindustryads.com sits on Google Cloud DNS; leadlockpro.com on Cloudflare — the two domains are managed on different infrastructure. The LeadLock domain routes every path to its homepage; the agency domain returns true 404s for dead paths.

Collateral and delivery: Canva for design; Google Drive for asset hosting and delivery.

AI tooling: None in the stack and none claimed.

Team & delivery footprint

No team page exists on either property, and no one beyond the two founders is named anywhere — a sharp contrast with the repeated invocation of "your team" throughout client testimonials, which praise the team's responsiveness and technical depth. The people delivering the work are real; they are simply invisible.

The team is asserted, never enumerated. "Our team of incredible women understand both the art & science of advertising on Google + Meta"; "we have the privilege of employing a team of incredible women." Clients describe working with multiple team members — "your entire team is very tech-savvy" — confirming delivery capacity beyond the founders.

Active recruiting. The firm has recruited for a Google and Meta Ads Strategist: a year of experience on each platform, multi-account management, strong tracking and optimisation skills, and ownership of client calls, campaign performance, funnel optimisation, and creative strategy.

Three businesses across two people. Neither founder works on Wedding Industry Ads exclusively. Whitney Hodges maintains her own Meta-ads practice for coaches and course creators; Daniela Justus operates DEJA with its own client base. WIA is the third business across two principals — the single most consequential fact about its delivery capacity, and one no page of theirs states.

Selected public-facing results / outcomes

Highest claim: A ~13× return on ad spend for one venue client after five months — the founders' own headline number, given in interviews.

Stated norm: 3–4× return on ad spend as the consistent client result, varying with business type, market position, and growth objectives.

The one dated client account: Alyssa, quoted in the Investment Guide: "December I had THE MOST inquiries in a single month, ever! And it was a lights-out sales month! For January, if we keep pace, I'll have double the inquiries from last January. We're also getting the MOST INCREDIBLE inquiries at new, amazing, ideal venues!"

Testimonials: Six, first-name-and-role, uniformly qualitative — responsiveness, industry knowledge, communication, "100% worth the money to have WIA do this for us." None carries a metric.

Case study: One — the Tennessee all-inclusive mountain venue, promoted as "breaking down all the numbers". The numbers sit behind a lead-capture form.

The proof stack, plainly assessed. No named-client case study with attributed metrics exists in public. The outcome evidence is anonymous, gated, or spoken — the weakest element of an otherwise disciplined public presence, and the clearest gap between what they sell (measurable performance) and what they show.

Credibility markers & third-party profiles (signals)

The featured-in wall is the primary asset. Fourteen placements across the wedding-education circuit demonstrate genuine network reach — while remaining relationship-driven rather than editorially vetted. They evidence access, not audited performance.

Aisle Planner is the strongest single marker. A wedding-software company choosing WIA as its own ads agency is a peer endorsement — and it sits quietly in a testimonial carousel rather than being named as a case study.

Modest social proof, consistent with doctrine. Roughly 1,200 Instagram followers — small for an agency, and exactly what their own thesis predicts, since they tell clients followers are not the goal.

The absences are as informative as the presences:

Platform certifications: No Google Partner or Meta Business Partner status.

Review platforms: No Clutch, G2, Trustpilot, or BBB presence. Every testimonial is self-published and self-selected; no independent review corpus exists.

Awards and press: No awards, rankings, or editorial press coverage. They do not appear in the "top agency" directory listings common for firms of this size.

Adverse record: Clean — no negative press, litigation, regulatory action, or public complaints.

"Needles in the haystack" (unexpected or buried public items)

The findings below are the items a casual review of the website will not surface. The first two are commercially significant defects in WIA's own funnel; each was verified end-to-end.

A. The mobile "YES, I'M READY!" call to action lands on a 404. The homepage renders its mid-page CTA twice: a desktop button and a mobile-only variant. On desktop, the button opens the Investment Guide capture modal and the funnel works. On a phone, the same-labelled button — sitting directly beneath "Ready to fill your pipeline with qualified leads?" — is a link to /ads-consultation94, a deleted funnel step, and tapping it lands the visitor on a bare "404 — Page not found" screen. Working consultation-booking pages exist at /ads-consultation and /ads-consultation1; the mobile button was simply never repointed. The defect is invisible from a desktop, which is presumably why it has survived — and it means every phone visitor who accepts the page's central invitation hits a dead end.

B. The "gated" Investment Guide is not gated — the full price list is public. The guide's delivery page, /investment-guide, is directly reachable without completing any form, and it links to a Google Drive file shared with open link permissions containing the complete 12-page price list. Two consequences: the lead capture behind fourteen homepage buttons can be bypassed entirely, and any competitor can read WIA's full pricing — $1,997, $1,697, $3,197, and the $2,500-per-month retainer average — without ever identifying themselves. The pricing in this dossier comes from that file.

C. The website and the sales collateral sell different offer architectures. The site sells "Elevate" and a three-month "Ads Accelerators" programme. The Investment Guide — the document a serious prospect actually reads — never contains the word "Elevate": its retainer is "Done-For-You Ads Management" behind a waitlist, its Accelerator is split into two separately priced platform products plus a bundle, and the bundle promises six months of guided support, not three. Ad-budget guidance drifts the same way: the founders' spoken figures run roughly double the guide's floor. A prospect who reads both encounters different product names, a different product count, and a different engagement length.

D. Stale copy is live across both properties. The /scheduler booking page still carries "© 2023 Wedding Industry Ads". The LeadLock homepage opens its pitch with "so here's the reality in 2025..." — while its own footer, driven by an auto-updating template variable, correctly shows 2026: the hand-written copy aged, the template did not. Orphaned but live pages (/case-study, /funnel-map-optin1, /schedule-a-demo) linger unlinked from the homepage, and one live page misspells "peace of mind" as "piece of mind".

E. A retired offer page was cloned and never fully rewritten. The 2024–25 Google Ads VIP Day page pitched Meta throughout — "we help wedding business owners... by strategically leveraging Meta Ads", "ready to stand out on Facebook & Instagram", and an application step checking fit for "our Meta Ad Strategy". The Google page was copy-pasted from the Meta page and only partly edited. Historical — but the same template-reuse-outrunning-QA pattern that produces findings A, C, and D on the live site today.

F. Three businesses, two people. Whitney Hodges runs an active separate Meta-ads practice; Daniela Justus runs DEJA, a separately registered Texas agency with its own clients — and DEJA is where the partnership began, making WIA the newest of the three ventures. Capacity, response times, and the ability to absorb growth all sit downstream of this split, and nothing on WIA's site mentions it.

G. An agency selling discoverability owns almost none of its own. No blog, empty sitemap, blank robots.txt, no CMS, no team page, no partner badges, no third-party reviews. Visibility is entirely borrowed (podcasts, summits) or paid. This is conviction, not neglect — their doctrine says content marketing is unnecessary for wedding pros — but the consequence is real: no compounding organic asset, and no search presence for the very keywords they sell to clients.

H. A grandfathered founding cohort constrains LeadLock's pricing. "Founding Members are granted full, unlimited access to the Platform, Content, and Services, regardless of future pricing" — a lifetime early-adopter cohort whose terms can never be repriced, permanently embedded in the product's revenue base.

I. LeadLock was planned long before it launched. The domain was registered in March 2023; the product went live in 2024. The gap reads as a product thesis held while the agency accumulated the client evidence to justify building it — LeadLock productises the exact follow-up gap their ads work kept exposing.

J. The primary domain expires in four months. weddingindustryads.com lapses on 8 December 2026 unless renewed — an administrative footnote, but one worth knowing for anyone doing business with the firm this winter.

Consolidated description

Wedding Industry Ads, LLC (weddingindustryads.com) is a two-founder, all-women boutique paid-media agency serving one vertical exclusively: wedding venues and vendors. Whitney Hodges (Liberty Hill, TX — a decade in luxury-event sales) and Daniela Justus (Lubbock, TX — an artist turned advertiser) met in 2020 in Facebook ads management, worked together inside Daniela's agency DEJA, and launched WIA in 2022. The firm is fully remote, registered to Whitney's home base in Williamson County, and serves clients internationally.

The commercial model has two service doors and a software product. Elevate is a done-for-you retainer averaging $2,500 per month blended with media spend, capacity-rationed behind a waitlist. The Ads Accelerators are one-time guided builds — $1,997 for Google,

$1,697 for Meta, $3,197 bundled with six months of support — repriced repackagings of 2024's single-day VIP Days, with Google up 33% and Meta flat. LeadLock, a wedding-specific lead-management system built openly on GoHighLevel, runs $1,697+ in setup plus $147 per month. Clients additionally budget $500 to $1,000+ per month in media. The positioning is anti-organic, anti-directory, and anti-DIY, and the through-line is that ads without an instant-response inquiry funnel waste money — which is precisely what LeadLock exists to fix.

The public presence is disciplined but thinly evidenced. Fourteen podcast and summit placements carry the authority; the outcome record is a spoken 13× return on ad spend, a 3–4× stated norm, one dated client quote, and a case study whose numbers sit behind a form. There is no blog, no team page, no partner badge, no independent review anywhere. And two defects sit inside the firm's own funnel: the mobile homepage CTA dead-ends on a 404, and the gated Investment Guide — the full price list — is publicly reachable without filling in the form.

Structurally, the business is smaller and more stretched than its marketing suggests: two named principals who each run a second agency, an unnamed contractor bench behind the "team" language, and active recruiting for an ads strategist. Its stated differentiator — deep per-brand personalisation on a consistent framework — is also, by construction, the part of the work that scales least easily.
